Background Materials and Research

Topic Summary: Prescription drug prices have increased at a faster pace than inflation in recent years and make up a growing share of total health care costs. High prescription drug costs affect not only individual consumers but also state, federal, and local governments. Both the federal government and state governments pay the cost of prescription drugs provided through the Medicaid program and the state Children’s Health Insurance Program (CHIP). State and federal governments also pay for prescription drugs through the health insurance plans they offer to their employees and when they cover medical costs for people who are being held in prisons and jails. Price increases in recent years have prompted efforts at both the state and federal levels to find ways to decrease costs.

States have taken various legislative approaches to the topic. Legislation includes measures to try to prevent price gouging, to allow drug importation from Canada, and to require disclosure of certain cost information. A 2017 Maryland price-gouging law has been found unconstitutional by a U.S. circuit court, but the state has appealed the ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court.

At the federal level in 2018, the Trump administration released a plan for lowering drug costs. Congress also passed a law prohibiting the companies that administer drug benefits for health insurers from putting gag clauses into their contracts with pharmacies. The gag clauses typically prevent pharmacists from telling consumers that they might pay less for a drug if they pay out of pocket than if they use their insurance and make the required copayment.
